In the United States, nearly 5 million people suffer from neurodegenerative diseases and another half-million have neurofibromatosis. These diseases are characterized by the degeneration of nerves. Current treatments include surgery and stem cell therapy, with limited success. In search of new treatments, researchers are exploring the use of femtosecond laser surgery, to search for candidate genes that may be involved in this complicated regeneration process.